ANTH0029: The Anthropology of Nationalism, Ethnicity and Race (4 items)

2018-2019 Term 2

Lecturer: Dr Rebekah Plueckhahn

Office:

Email: r.plueckhahn@ucl.ac.uk

Student feedback and consultation hours: TBC once my timetable is finalised and by appointment.

Undergraduate Lecture: Fridays 9-11am, Taviton 16, Room 431

Postgraduate Seminar: Fridays 2-4pm, Birkbeck Gordon Sq (43) 104.

Undergraduate tutorials are held on Fridays:

Tutorial One: Gordon Square (22) B15, Friday 12-1pm

Tutorial Two: Gordon Square (22) B15, Friday 1-2pm

This course examines the concepts and practices of 'ethnicity,' 'race' and 'nation,' as bases of social and political belonging and differentiation and as sources of both comfort and conflict. The focus will be on the creation and reworking of categories and forms of identification in different places, where we will examine aspects of the lived experience of 'ethnic' and 'national' attachments and their changing forms. We start with the premise that nationalism, race and ethnicity are socially constructed and emergent forms of affiliation rather than substantial entities. Nationalism, race and ethnicity will be studied, seeking to understand them as relational processes unfolding in the historical contexts in which they have developed. As such, the course is not limited to the specialized fields of nationalism, race and ethnicity but has a broader relevance to anthropology and social and political sciences.

The format of the course relies on both lectures with some student participation and discussion during the tutorials. All students are required to engage in critical analysis of the required readings.

Readings consist of a variety of articles and book selections. The readings are primarily anthropological but we will peruse a few classics from political theory, feminist writings, culture studies and history. For each week there are THREE REQUIRED readings, some more conceptual but at least one of them will present an ethnographic case that has been selected to exemplify theory. Additional recommended readings will appear on your library reading list, however, not all additional readings will be digitised.

Please note that I will be adding further readings throughout Term 2, so the library list will be live and continuously updated. You might find the 'suggested readings' useful when it comes to writing your essays.

The readings can be found in:

1) online

2) main collection in UCL libraries

3) Other London libraries, especially the British Library (you need to register).

Assessment and Requirements

1. You are required to complete each week's readings prior to your tutorial. The key readings will be integrated in the lecture but we will discuss them critically during the tutorials.

2. There is no exam in this course.

For Undergraduates, the course will be assessed by two essays of 2000 words each. Each essay is worth 50% of the final grade.

For the Masters students, assessment will be one 3000 word essay.

1. Week One (Jan 11): Introduction (15 items)

Introduction to the requirements and themes of the course, followed by a brief historical overview of the genealogy of nationalism. This week introduces students to a number of important theoretical issues. We will do this through exploring how the terms nationalism, ethnicity and race have been used in anthropology and related fields. Questions: Why should we study race, ethnicity and nationalism together? What is the affinity between them? What is the scholarly benefit of the shift between asking what an ethnic group or nation is, to attempts to specify how ethnicity, race and nation work?

2. Week Two (Jan 18): Nations and Nationalism (14 items)

We will discuss the origins of nation states and explore how nations become felt, experiential worlds charged with political and ethical dilemmas. We will also ask the ways that the conceptualization of nation-states is changing.

Questions: What are the origins of nation-states? Are there ancient and new nations? How do people come to think of themselves as part of a nation? Are they a necessary ideal for the group and what constitutes a group in the first place? How do nations become plausible and persuasive?

3. Week Three (Jan 25): Ethnicity. (21 items)

This lecture adopts a constructivist approach to ethnicity as an agentic historical process of categorizing people. We will look at these complex issues through multiple ethnographic examples and explore the implications of coupling culture and ethnicity for our understanding of diversity. Questions: How do ethnic categories come into being? What is erased in the process? What does it mean to be of a particular descent?

4. Week Four (Feb 1): “Race” and the process of racialisation. (25 items)

This week our focus is on race. Is race rooted in human biology or culture? How is race constructed in relation to the colour of skin? If race is an obsolete category of anthropological analysis (as some have argued), how can we account for enduring, sometimes unwitting forms of racism? We will explore ethnographic particularities and historical change and continuity in attitudes towards "race" and racism.

5. Week Five (Feb 8): Performance, Art, Culture and Ethnicity (20 items)

This lecture explores ethnicity through the lens of musical performance and visual art. We will look at the links between artistic practice, national, transnational and local conceptualisations of ethnic and cultural identity and experiences of racialisation.

Questions: Is ethnicity a performance? How does performance constitute ethnicity? What role can performance and art play in experiences of racialisation? What role does performance and art have in constituting social worlds? How do performed ethnicities or cultural identities become a commodity for sale? And how does this become implicated in circulations of prestige, value, politics and meaning-making between people?

6. Week Six : Reading Week - Beginning February 11th (1 items)

No class

7. Week Seven (Feb 22): Whiteness (19 items)

Many studies of 'race' take whiteness as self-evident. It is an implicit frame of reference. Is whiteness invisible? How can 'whiteness' be unproblematic if it continues to be a location of privilege? Who and under what conditions is perceived as white? Can affirmation of whiteness be studied as a non-racist phenomenon? What is it like to be white in South Africa? We will explore the neglected problem of whiteness from multiple perspectives. How do white people see themselves and are seen by black persons? This lecture is crucial for understanding 'whiteness' as an ethnographic category.
